Intercultural Competence Starts At Home: Leveraging Impact of On-Campus International Initiatives for Location-Bound Students

- Athena Mison Fulay, Institute of International Education
- Karen Wachsmuth, University of Iowa
- Hope Windle, SUNY COIL
- Danixia Cuevas, Miami Dade College

For our discussion:

- How under-resourced institutions can leverage technology to provide international engagement to their campus community
- How innovative models of international engagement can better address the current needs of students
- How federally funded public diplomacy programs can have a profound impact as they enter a modern and multicultural workforce

Student: "The College changed my life around"

Desmond Meade

For years, Desmond Meade slept behind buildings and worried more about scoring his next high than his next meal.

Today, the Miami Dade College student, who was still homeless when he first enrolled in the College's Paralegal Studies program, is a junior pursuing his bachelor's degree in public safety management in MDC's School of Justice.

Meade has his sights set on Harvard Law School and wants to help people who today resemble the man he used to be.

"I realized that the only way my experiences were ever going to be worth anything was if I could help someone else going through the same thing," Meade said.

Meade is the president of the Society of Law and Community Service, an organization he started at the College in the spring. He formed the organization because he "wanted to enhance students' learning environment and give them the opportunity to work with
